The Quest of His Excellency, Hugh Izzit

And so after completing the tasks laid before him, Lord Izzit had found his way in front of the throne making such an impression that after much discussion he became holder of lands for His Majesty and thus went straightway to his good friend, and now former employer, for advice. Lord Armstrong was pleased to see him, but very surprised at the entourage Izzit acquired.

“It was a surprise to me as well, but I’ve apparently made such a name for myself and come to know everyone so well, that it impressed His Majesty so much he arranged for me to be in charge of a small section of land.”

“Indeed, Hugh. What exactly did His Majesty say?”

“After being presented to him, and a small conversation His Majesty sighed, placed his hand on his head and said, ‘Certainly your head is barren!’ Well, I was in shock at this suggestion but of course I accepted it for one shouldn’t refuse gifts from His Majesty. And it must be an area that needs drastic improvement for after my acceptance, they rushed to write out this proclamation and my ceremony was so quick, it was almost like His Majesty was trying to send me on my way.”

Lord Armstrong looked to the heavens and whispered something about “O Fortuna..” bowed his head, then asked after looking back up, “So you’re now a baron. Do you know what you’re going to do once you arrive at these lands?”

“I’m not quite sure at all, hence the reason why I stopped by to see you. Your advice has been so good, I knew you would either tell me or point me in the direction of the answer.”

“Well in order to govern an area, you must first learn how to perform various necessary tasks, jobs, and chores of the region yourself.” And yet once again, the scholar took quill to parchment and wrote out a list that he presented to the young Baron.
